With the sweeping social changes that occurred after World War II - the civil rights movement and pursuant affirmative-action policies of the late 1960s - African Americans not only began to appear in greater numbers (or to appear for the first time) on college campuses across America but began to shape the character of university life. Before this period of freedom and opportunity, however, any African American who wished a higher education had to fend for him- or herself in an often harsh environment, within a system of routinized prejudice in which the deck was stacked against the black individual even if he or she achieved academic success. In short, high grades and a diploma were no guarantee of professional success. In this sprightly, forthright, and inspirational collection of interviews with some of the first African Americans to graduate from the University of California at Berkeley, Gabrielle Morris presents a composite portrait of the black student at a primarily white college from 1914 to 1960. The anecdotal, lively quality of these narratives of accomplished individuals—legislators, lawyers, pioneering librarians and educators, businessmen, an economist, a chemist, an optometrist, and a pilot - offers a one-to-one experience, like an older friend or relative telling what life was like for a black college student in the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s. These interviewees confront racial stereotypes through their testimony about their childhoods, early hardships, and experiences as part of a small minority at a major university. They tell about the teachers who influenced their thinking and reveal their intense determination to get an education and advance themselves professionally. Despite the strides in social justice that resulted from the civil rights movement, many young African Americans in the 1990s still express frustration at the emotional isolation they feel on mostly white campuses. Many of the narrators in this volume were active in the struggles of the early twentieth century that brought about the major social and political changes of the 1960s, and their similar testimonials to isolation - in the sheer physical sense as well as emotionally - should prove insightful and encouraging to young black students of today.

COSMETOLOGISTS ARE TRAINED TO MAINTAIN and care for hair, skin, and nails. Most are hair stylists, estheticians, nail technicians, or makeup artists. This is a very broad industry that offers numerous opportunities to specialize in very specific kinds of work. For example, a trained hair stylist might work only with wigs and hairpieces, or a makeup artist might work in live theater or for a local TV station. Most specializations are based on personal preference and experience, but some such as microderm abrasion or master coloring, require advanced training. There are more than 600,000 of these professionals working in the US. That number is expected to rise faster than the average for the foreseeable future. The demand for licensed cosmetologists is greatest in hair salons and barber shops, nail salons, and day spas. There are also many jobs being created in resort hotels and department stores, on cruise ships and film and television sets, and backstage at fashion shows and magazine photo shoots. There are even traveling cosmetologists who bring their services to people in their own homes, assisted living facilities, hospitals, or small towns that do not have a salon. If you are creative, good with people, and willing to keep learning more about your craft, this could be the right career choice for you. Cosmetology is a rock-solid profession that thrives even through economic downturns. Women and men always want to feel good about the way they look - almost more than anything else.

Based on the experiences of three leading educational organizations, the authors provide invaluable, research-based guidelines for incorporating inquiry into teacher's instructional practices and student work as part of the ongoing work of schools. The growing use of the internet in education and its enormous potential for the future raise important philosophical questions about, for instance, teaching and learning, equality and access, the structure of digitised knowledge or the social role of education. Much depends upon how, and against what background assumptions, these new technologies are used. This volume critically explores key philosophical issues in the rise of technology in education, including assumptions about the inevitability of radical change, the virtues of networking, and the need for adaptability in learning and employment. It also looks at the growing practices of Distance Education and Open Learning as well as on-site uses of the internet, examining the social and cultural dimensions to assess the genuine benefits for education. While resisting easy utopianism, this volume is in no sense pessimistic. On the contrary, it highlights the genuine potential of new technology to transform education, and its critical importance in global and political terms.
